Speaking to a group of French priests pursuing higher studies, Pope Francis said “With your limitations, your frailties, your tribulations, there is always a loving gaze resting on you and giving you confidence.” He encouraged gratitude as “a powerful weapon” that “allows us to keep the flame of hope burning in moments of discouragement, loneliness, and trials.”

These words of encouragement from our Holy Father are encouraging words meant for the priests he was speaking to, but they are also meant for us. While some of us may be past our New Year’s Resolutions for this year, I’d like to invite you to consider to another resolution: to make gratitude part of your discipline all year round, Brené Brown describes what might be called the five temptations against whole-hearted living, or what we might call degrees of a lack of gratitude. With prayerful effort, we all can choose gratitude over grumpiness despite all the reasons that tempt us towards half-hearted grouchiness.

I share with you a brief inventory of self-awareness that we may use to prevent the grumpiness of a beastly heart and promote gratitude which helps to promote and elevate the human heart.

- Do I demonstrate empathy rather than pity?
- Do I attempt to appreciate the feelings of others even when those feelings make me uncomfortable?
- Am I judgmental?
- Am I quick to blame, shame, or scold others?
- Am I often impatient or even angry?
- Do I ask for the grace to look for the support I need to consistently choose gratitude over grumpiness?

Jesus gives us many excellent examples of human health and happiness. Jesus exercised, he spent lots of time with friends, and he was a healthy eater. He even took naps when he was tired. While all this may sound a lot like secular health and wellness tips rather than spiritual tips, we know that grace builds on nature. A hurting person is more likely to hurt another. A grateful person is more likely to appreciate others. If we’ve lost the gratitude of life we once had, let’s work hard to reclaim it and appreciate all of the blessings of this life that the Lord has bestowed upon us.
